Share Facebook Twitter Reddit Editors' Note: In late October, after we posted this story and alert reader Blightstone pointed out that it has not been updated in over a year, we've re-evaluated the benchmarks for the new 4th generation Core i5 and Core i7 processors. We've updated our review to include the new numbers, as well as a look at why Apple may not be significantly happier with Intel's Sandy Bridge CPUs than it was with the previous-gen Sandy Bridge E and Ivy Bridge chips. Read on for the new review, as well as a look at processor power consumption and side-by-side performance of the new Core i5 and Core i7 chips against their Nehalem and Ivy Bridge predecessors. Beware the Better-Than-It-Should-Be, Better-Than-It-Never-Was Syndrome Over the years, I've thought about — and played with — the better-than-it-should-be computers I've used, the ones that were more powerful, more stable, more dependable than advertised, even the ones that were dirt cheap and still seemed to be made with care.
