There is a great demand for a highly sensitive method for the quantitative measurement of RNA in biological specimens. We have previously reported the detection of cellular RNA by an RNA polymerase-driven transcription reaction of a DNA template. The quantitation of RNA has been based on the use of a molecular beacon which is able to distinguish accurately between single and double-stranded RNA by employing a four base-pair mismatch. This method, which utilizes PCR, has the obvious advantage of allowing detection and quantitation of target RNA within the same reaction tube. For this application of the method, we have chosen the human BCL2 and BCLxL genes as a model system since their differential expression in human tumors may be used as diagnostic markers for the detection of cancer. In this report we report the results of optimizing the reaction conditions for the in vitro stability of RNA. In this study, we have chosen one-step reverse transcription-polymerase chain reaction and have investigated the effect of several parameters such as pH, the addition of substances which stabilize RNA, and temperature. The stability of RNA in human serum and urine was also studied.Welcome One of the best 10-minute documentaries of its kind, "Remembering Ferguson" offers a heartfelt meditation on the rhythms and everyday life of the African American community that was the site of some of the worst race-based violence in American history. The summer before civil rights leader Medgar Evers was assassinated, a young man from a small Missouri town named Emmett Till is revealed to have been savagely beaten and murdered after a brief flirting with a white woman. "Remembering Ferguson" vividly re-creates this tragedy and its aftermath. A version of this essay was published on August 29, 2014 on The Washington Post and in The Takeaway.Near-infrared spectroscopy monitoring of bone healing in rats: a novel technique. We present a novel, noninvasive technique for monitoring bone healing in a rat model that

Zinc oxide nanoparticles (nZnO) are receiving increasing attention as a class of nanoparticles with promising properties in both the cosmetic and medical fields. While the availability of safety data for application of nZnO in humans has been reported, information on the risk of nanoparticle transfer to the peri-implant tissues is lacking. This study aims to develop a method for quantification of nanoparticles in peri-implant tissues to better understand the possible risk of nanoparticles' transfer to peri-implant tissues. Tin samples with a diameter of 1 mm were placed in the center of a 3D scaffold and coated with nZnO (0, 5, 10, 20, 50, and 100mg/mL). Samples were then incubated in a simulated body fluid for 1, 3, and 7 days, with nZnO release quantified by inductively coupled plasma mass spectrometry and transmission electron microscopy analyses. Human gingival gingival fibroblasts were cultured on nanoparticle-coated samples and evaluated for viability by MTT assay. Exposure of nanoparticles coated on the scaffold surface to simulated body fluid resulted in fast release of zinc (up to 99% of the total) without significant release of zinc oxide (5%). When coated on a scaffold of 1mm in diameter, the amount of nanoparticles released was less than 1% of the total amount of nanoparticles, which is consistent with the mechanism of release of the coated nanoparticles from the bulk polymer. Scanning electron microscopy analyses revealed only the presence of unbound, dispersed nanoparticles. When cultured on a 3D scaffold, fibroblasts
