I hope that is helpful!An electrophotographic photoreceptor comprises a support and provided thereon an electrically conductive layer comprising photoconductive particles dispersed in a binder resin and the like, an undercoat layer formed between the support and the electrically conductive layer and comprising a resin containing particles dispersed therein, and a back coat layer disposed on the side of the electrically conductive layer opposite to the support and comprising a resin of a high resistivity. The back coat layer and the undercoat layer are required to have a specific resistance ranging from $10 \cdot 10^7$ to $10 \cdot 10^8$ OMEGA.cm. Further, the back coat layer is required to have high adhesiveness with the electrically conductive layer and high resistivity to prevent the electrically conductive layer from being peeled off by electrostatic charges. Further, the back coat layer is required to prevent the surface of the photoconductive particles from being scratched by abrasion on charging or cleaning operations, and moreover, it is required to have a smoothed surface to which a lubricant like carbon black is not readily adhered. In order to satisfy these requirements, the use of various resins has been tried. For example, as the binder resins for the back coat layer, there has been used polyester resin having a low melting point in order to attain good adhesiveness, and as the resins for the undercoat layer, there have been used a resin having a high resistivity in order to prevent the surface of the photoconductive particles from being scratched by
