Glucocorticoid receptor activation and myosin light chain kinase inhibition in the modulation of human platelet function. Thrombin and other agonists release inositol 1,4,5-trisphosphate (IP3) and diacylglycerol (DAG) from the intracellular stores of human platelets, which activate cytosolic protein kinase C (PKC) and stimulate phospholipase C. PKC translocates to the outer membrane leaflet where it causes shape change, inhibition of cyclic nucleotide phosphodiesterases, and release of Ca<sup>2+</sup> from intracellular stores. Prolonged exposure of platelets to thrombin or other agonists causes release of arachidonic acid which, after conversion to prostaglandins and prostacyclin, contributes to the characteristic platelet hyperaggregatory and vasoconstrictor actions of thrombin. In addition, prostacyclin (PGI<sub>2</sub>) causes increased formation of IP3 and DAG, which may contribute to the loss of shape and inhibition of platelet aggregation. Using human platelets stimulated with thrombin or arachidonic acid, we examined the ability of the glucocorticoid analogue dexamethasone to inhibit IP3 formation and phospholipase C activation. We show that dexamethasone inhibits IP3 and DAG formation and PLC activity in platelets stimulated with thrombin and arachidonic acid. Inhibition of PLC was associated with inhibition of PKC translocation to the cell surface and subsequent inhibition of shape change. Prevention of aggregation in a dose-dependent manner with higher concentrations of dexamethasone suggested the ability of this analogue to inhibit the cyclic nucleotide system. Furthermore, 30 min pretreatment of washed platelets with 5 microM dexamethasone inhibited arachidonic acid mobilization and aggregation induced by thrombin. Hence, in addition to its ability to inhibit arachidonic acid mobilization, the glucocorticoid analogue dexamethasone can potently inhibit platelet aggregation, possibly by inhibiting PKC translocation and phospholipase activation as well as cyclic nucleotide formation.

Q: Vue Router (vue-router-lib) Go to Login Page I have two routes, sign-up and login. Both can only be accessed when the user is logged in. If I logout and go to the sign-up page, the login page should show and I can log in to the site. When I log out and go to the login page, it should direct me to the sign-up page. I tried to do this with VueRouter. I have set up the route to check if a user is logged in, and when the user is logged in, it should direct the user to the sign-up page. Here is my Route configuration: `this.$router.beforeEach((to, from, next) => { if (to.meta.token) { console.log(`Before: ${to.meta.token}`); next(); } else { next('/login'); } });` But this will always jump to the login page. How can I do this? A: I don't believe that you can achieve this with the built-in router. It seems as though you need to alter the session to indicate whether the user is logged in. For this, you can use a localStorage item with a value of "true" for a user logged in and false for otherwise. Then, in the next route you set the before each to check against this. See what I did in the following sandbox to demonstrate: `{ message: 'Please Enter Employee ID', type: 'input', autoComplete: "off", title: 'Id', 'data-container': 'body',`
