PhotoPrint Server Pro.Q: MS Access SQL query: number of matches I have a table defined as so: ID, CompanyID, Name, Email If a companyID has multiple email addresses, how can I write a query that returns the number of times each email address appears? The type of table is called a PeopleSoft PeopleTable. A: select email, count() from tbl_Records group by email The problem with your data is that all records belonging to a Company are considered for a group, and no duplicates are filtered (if you remove duplicates, count will be accurate). If your company ID is the PK and each record has only one email, this will work (you will get only one record per email): select t.email, count() from tbl_Records t group by t.email If you only want to count unique emails, replace count with count(distinct). Q: Usage of Underscore within lambda I was reading a book on functional programming where the author is creating a function that creates a list. The author makes use of underscore within his lambda function and to me, it does look like he could not be using a good functional programming pattern since I have heard people describing `_x` as creating a singleton list which is not possible. // fn is the name of the function function fn(data) { var list = []; `_each`(data, function(value, key) { list = list.concat(key, value); }); return list; } I need to know how he is able to create a list which will hold the key and the value. A: It's not creating a singleton list. It is creating an array with two values. var list = [] `_each`(data, function(value, key) { list.push(key, value); }); Where `_each()` is a shortcut to `each()` (and similar methods in JavaScript 6d1f23a050
